a.) Is the author's approach to the central idea objective or subjective? Explain.

The author's approach is subjective. The text critiques the American economic system and societal values with a clear personal perspective, using phrases like "our only stability is change" and "there is no honor but in the Wonderland race". The tone is ~~ex~~ critical and reflective, suggesting the author is expressing an opinion rather than presenting an unbiased analysis.

b.) What is the author's intention?

The author's intention is to critique the American emphasis on constant economic mobility and competition, arguing that it undermines social stability, interdependence and appreciation for steady, collective contributions (e.g. clerks, social worker). The text challenges the idealized notion of the "free enterprise system" by highlighting its neglect of social cohesion.

c.) What is central idea or assertion of the text?

The central idea is that the U.S. prioritizes perpetual economic competition and change over stability, valuing individual opportunities and ~~mobility~~ mobility but dismissing the importance of social and ~~inter~~ interdependence, and appreciation for steady, collective contributions (eg clerks, social workers). The text challenges the idealized notion of the "free enterprise system" by highlighting its neglect of societal cohesion.

c) ~~What is the central idea or assertion of the text?~~

The central idea

d.) What is the effect of the tone at the beginning of the text?

The tone of the beginning is analytical yet subtly critical, referencing Woodrow Wilson's praise for free enterprise to set up a contrast with the author's later critique. This draws the reader in with a seemingly neutral premise before revealing deeper skepticism about the system's societal costs.

e) What rhetorical methods are used to develop the argument?

1.) METAPHOR: The "race" symbolizes relentless competitions.

2.) CONTRAST: Compares American mobility with "Old world" stability.

CAUSE / EFFECT:-

Links the force on change to the devaluation of social roles.

CRITIQUE OF IRONY: Highlights contradictions (eg "no pride in interdependence" despite its necessity).

Allusion: References Wilson and cultural "legends" to ground the argument in historical context.

f) What is the following effect of tone at the end of the text?

The tone at the end is cynical and resigned, emphasizing futility ("none winning in the end"). Phrases like "no honor but in the Wonderland race" underscore the author's view that the system is unsustainable and unfulfilling, leaving readers with a sense of critique disillusionment.
